Dollar firms in the aftermath of the Fed meeting

As expected, the Fed left interest rates on hold for a fifth consecutive meeting yesterday. However, two governors (Waller and Bowman) dissented, with both preferring to cut rates by 25bps. Despite the apparent dovish shift by some members of the FOMC, Chair Powell struck a somewhat hawkish tone at the post-meeting press conference. Against this backdrop, US futures contracts firmed. Market pricing now suggests that there is roughly a 50% chance (was 65%) the Fed cuts at its next meeting in September, and circa 35bps of policy easing (was 45bps) is expected by year end. Elsewhere on the monetary policy front, the BoJ also left rates unchanged overnight, as anticipated.

Data-wise, the first reading of US GDP for Q2 printed above the consensus. GDP expanded by 3.0% annualised (vs. 2.4% f'cast) in the quarter, largely owing to a sharp reversal in imports, which surged in Q1 as firms tried to front-run tariffs. Overall though, there has been a marked slowdown in underlying US activity in the first half of the year, with consumption and investment expanding at a weaker pace. Elsewhere, the first reading of Eurozone GDP for Q2 also beat expectations, albeit growth slowed markedly, rising by 0.1% in the quarter (vs. 0% f'cast) from 0.6% in Q1.

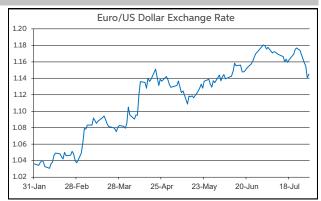

On the currency front, the dollar remained firmly in the ascendancy yesterday. The greenback was supported by the strong headline US GDP number and by the aforementioned firming in US rate expectations. This is reflected by EUR/USD opening this morning back at the midpoint of $1.14-1.15. GBP/USD is operating down below the $1.33 mark. EUR/GBP is in the lower half of 86-87p.

Turning to the day ahead, the focus will remain on the US data calendar, which features core-PCE inflation. It is forecast to remain at 2.7% in June. Meantime, the flash estimates of German, French and Italian HICP inflation for July are also due.
