Jam-packed week ahead

Some disappointing US data, a slew of corporate earnings reports and tariff related newsflow impacted proceedings on financial markets throughout last week. Against his backdrop, there was a cautious tone to investor sentiment. This is reflected by the Euro Stoxx 50 falling by 0.2%, while the S&P 500 declined by a 1.0%.

Data-wise, US consumer confidence deteriorated in February (98.3 vs. 102.5 f'cast). Similarly, US personal consumption fell by 0.2% in January (vs. +0.1% f'cast). Both indicators follow a number of other below consensus US data points recently, which have contributed to the Citibank surprise index turning negative and to the Atlanta Fed nowcast model now indicating that GDP contracted in Q1.

Amid the recent downturn in US data, market participants are now pricing in a faster pace of policy easing from the Fed this year. A rate cut is priced-in for June, with a total of 65bps worth of easing now expected by year end. As US rate expectations softened last week, Treasury yields fell by circa 20-25bps.

Despite the softening in US rates and the growing concern around the economic outlook, the dollar was underpinned by President Trump's rhetoric regarding tariffs. Overall, the greenback gained 0.5% versus the yen and sterling, and 1% against the euro last week. This sees EUR/USD open today back near the $1.04 mark. EUR/GBP is in the top half of the 82-83p corridor.

This week, the main focus will be on the ECB policy meeting and the US labour market report (Feb). Eurozone flash HICP inflation will also garner close attention, as will the US labour market report (Feb). Meantime, tariff related headlines and a speech by President Trump will likely influence markets at the start of the week.
