Spotlight on US inflation today

The action on currency markets yesterday saw the dollar continue to give up some ground to the euro and sterling. This occurred amid a softening in US Treasury yields/market rates. The weaker dollar tone is reflected in EUR/USD operating above the $1.08 threshold this morning, while GBP/USD is changing hands up near to $1.26. Elsewhere, EUR/GBP continues to trade in and around the 86p mark.

Ahead today, we get the key data highlight of the week with US CPI inflation for April due. Inflation numbers over the coming months will play a key role in the Fed's policy deliberations on when to start cutting rates. At its most recent meeting in early May, the Fed stated that it will have to keep rates at their current level for longer than previously envisaged. This is because the downtrend in US inflation stalled in Q1, meaning the Fed does not have enough confidence that it will achieve its 2% inflation target.

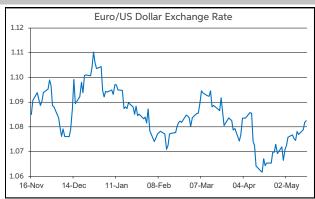

Today's US inflation numbers entail some two-way risk for the dollar. If they print ahead of forecasts then this could provide some upside support to the currency. However, if they come in softer than expected, then the dollar could experience some further downward pressure. The consensus is for both the headline and core rates to ease marginally in April, to 3.4% (from 3.5%) and 3.6% (from 3.8%), respectively. Aside from the CPI data, retail sales for April are also worthy of some attention on the US diary today.

Meanwhile, the second reading of Eurozone Q1 GDP, employment for Q1 and industrial production for March are the main releases of note on this side of the Atlantic. However, barring any major surprises, they are not be anticipated to have much directional impact on the euro.
