

EUR/USD down below $1.06

The risk averse tone to investor sentiment from last week persisted in Europe yesterday. The Euro Stoxx 50 fell by 0.9%. The downbeat mood mainly stems from concerns that official interest rates will remain at elevated levels for an extended period of time, following last weeks central bank meetings. Hawkish remarks from Fed officials yesterday provided little solace to markets in this regard.

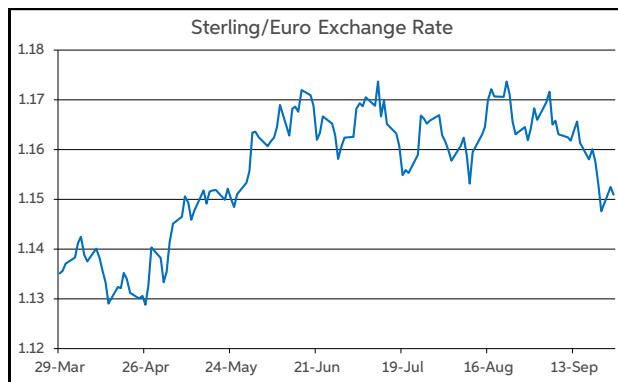

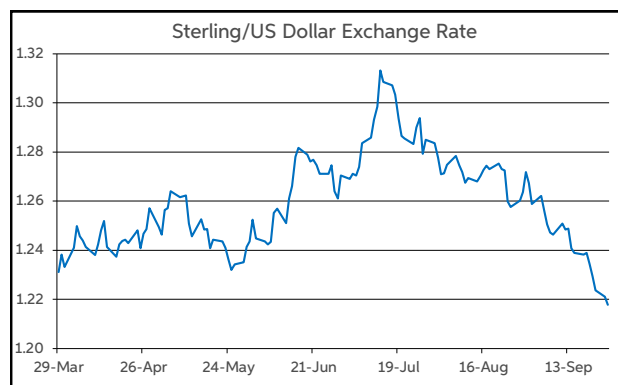

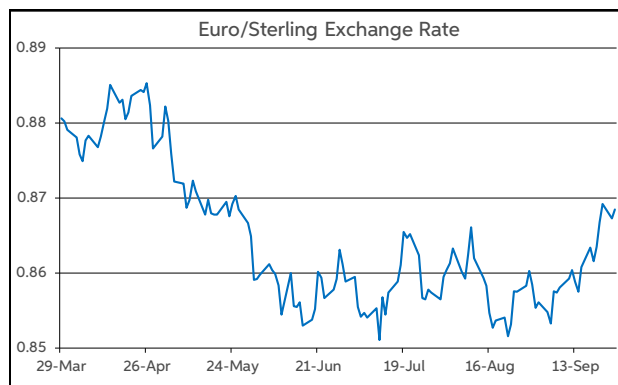

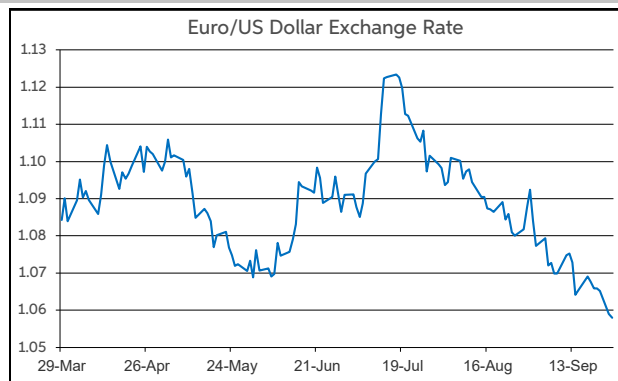

Against this backdrop, medium to long-term sovereign bond yields rose by 5-12bps, in the US, Eurozone and UK yesterday. Having reached a 15-year year last week, the benchmark US 10-year Treasury yields climbed above 4.50%. Elsewhere, oil prices edged slightly lower, with Brent crude falling back below $93 per barrel.

On the currency front, the dollar was in the ascendancy amid the hawkish Fed rhetoric, and the associated rise in US yields. Meanwhile, the yen was under some downward pressure following dovish comments from BoJ officials, including Governor Ueda. The euro was also on the defensive, as the German Ifo deteriorated for a fifth month running in September. Some less hawkish statements from ECB officials proved to be unhelpful for the euro as well.

In level terms, the firmer dollar and softer euro tones are reflected in EUR/USD opening back below the $1.06 threshold. GBP/USD is operating down below the $1.22 handle. Elsewhere, EUR/GBP is changing hands in the top half of the 86-87p range. USD/JPY is trading up above ¥149, its highest level since October last year.

Today, there is a relatively quiet data schedule. The only release of note is US consumer confidence for September. The consensus is for a slight fall in the index. Meantime, remarks from Fed and ECB officials will garner some attention.
